

More and more, monolithic corporations are consuming the airwaves. It has to stop to keep from eroding the freedom of information we supposedly embody. Not only should companies not be allowed to monopolize the broadcast outlets in any given market, every effort should be made and, in fact, codified, to ensure that an equal cross-section of philosophical predilections are guaranteed. If not, the freedoms we cherish may become relics of another age.